

This is a typical street I walked everyday to get around Cadiz. The old cobble stone and intricate architecture is charming and beautiful. I have never walked so much in my life, but I loved the exercise. Around every corner was either a gift store, bar, or grocery store which made getting food, supplies, and gifts so easy. Many people walk, but there are taxis and buses available which made traveling to the mall and beach much easier for me when I decided to go.

This was a brunch I had at Cafe de Ana. This cafe is so pretty with many cool antiques scattered around the cafe. The food was amazing. I went back multiple times since the food was so good. It is a 20 minute walk from where I was staying, which works up a great appetite. This is one of the many great restaurants/bars I went to for food.

This is the Flamenco show I saw. It was so cool to be immersive in this central part of Spanish culture. I learned that a Flamenco is not only a dance but involves someone playing a guitar, a singer, and a dancer (here there are two on the left). The female dancer was so expressive and was my favorite part of the show. The show was held underground in a “cave”. I drank wine and ate cheese and ham while watching the show. Later in the trip I also took a Flamenco lesson which showed me how difficult it actually is to dance.
